History isn't always what it seems...

Twelve months after his change, Alec MacAidan is still getting used to his many vampire talents. While most vampires would give anything to have more than one supernatural power, Alec craves nothing more than peace and time alone with Cronin. But when Alec meets entities from outside this realm, he's left powerless in their presence.

Zoan are half-lycan, half-dragon creatures that have slipped through time and reality, seemingly undetected by man and vampire. Or have they? They bear an uncanny resemblance to gargoyles, leaving Alec's view on all things weird to get a whole lot weirder.

This new quest leads Alec, Cronin, and their band of friends to Paris, Rome, and Moscow, where they learn that gargoyles aren't simply statues on walls. In the underground pits beneath churches all over the world, Alec discovers the Key's true destiny. Facing the Zoan might take every talent he has. And he may need help from the dead to get them all out alive.

I've enjoyed this series but the fact the author lost track of characters near the end of this one ruined it for me. The author actually confused the female Russian with the female Italian. Many times. It was the climax of the story and I was pulled out by the fact that the author was themselves confused by who was who.

Fast and furious, vampire-style.

By V. Rundell of V's Reads

This is the third, and possibly final, book in the Cronin's Key series. Alec MacAidan is the key to the survival of the human species. He's only been a vampire for the past 18 months, but he's the Chosen One, if you will, so he's had a busy time of it. I think it's a bit hard to pick this series up at the end, but, having read all the previous books, it's a fantastic adventure/romance.

In this book, the enemy is a group of otherworldly beings of lycan origin who call themselves Zoan. They are shapeshifters who can also stop time. The Zoan arrived on earth through a portal that opened straight from the pits of Hell, and Alec must figure out how to kill them, and shut down the portal before the world is under attack. Alec possesses every talent, or power, ever gifted to the vampire race, and he must use all of them to defeat the Zoan--if he can catch them.

In the meantime, petrified Zoan are being awakened all over the earth and new portals are opening. It's another race-against-time if Alec, Cronin and their band of vamps will have any chance to save mankind.

This is a fantastic adventure, though I had a few struggles with the fast pace and the constant motion. Part of the plot hinges on understanding the portals, where they are and how they work, and this means Alec must leap his group of vamps all over the world--in rapid succession--to investigate potential portals. At times, I think I was getting leaping sickness. I didn't get the "physics" behind the portals and parts where it was described, of which there are a few, dragged for me.

That said, Alec is faced by a foe he cannot initially defeat; the Zoan are ancient and possess power greater than his. Cronin is very sincerely worried that this battle may be the last. And, he's partly right. I think the idea of a vampire afterlife was remarkable, and I enjoyed how that was rendered.

There are so many characters in this series that have become dear to me, and I want to continue reading their stories of adventure. I've truly enjoyed the historical "borrowing" Ms. Walker has done to create Cronin and Alec's world and experiences, masking bouts of "extreme vampire and Zoan activity" into human tragedy and war has been a fun exercise in thought.

Plus, the bond of love between Cronin and Alec is so lovely I had to giggle a little at Alec's jealousy when encountering Cronin's former lover. Oh, the intensity! And insanity... ;) Poor Alec and Cronin! They just love each other to pieces--and that's what Alec left behind of the world's largest glacier when his temper took control. There are some tender bits, and I found Alec's newest talent--stopping time--was certainly put to most excellent use when he decided some lovin' was needed RIGHT NOW! Fun! I highly recommend this series.

4.5 stars

By gruvermom

While I was very happy with the way CK 2 ended, I was curious to know how Alec handles being the most powerful vampire in the world. I was intrigued to find out how Ms Walker was going to write a compelling story when there really isn't much Alec can't do. I was very impressed with creatures that can manipulate time and are from another reality. The imagination that went into creating this story is fantastic! The main characters deal with love, loss, other-worldly creatures, and the real threat of their own destruction.

Why not 5 stars? While I did love the story, I didn't have as huge a book-hangover as I did with the first 2 books. It was still a fantastic end to a wonderful story!

POV ...third person
