From School Library Journal

Grade 4-8-As part of a project in which homeless children are given cameras and taught photography, four young people document their lives through their images and interviews with the author. The two girls live at a church mission in Santa Monica, California; one of the boys is still on the move, while the other's family currently lives in a house, but does not have enough money for electricity. What the four have in common is a poignant vision of the American dream—a house they can call a home, surrounded by a fence, with a playful dog in the yard. While their black-and-white photos are not of a professional caliber, they do capture the ambiance of their neighborhoods and living conditions. There are no statistics here, just youthful perspectives and observations. Because their insights are not overly brutal, this volume may be an appropriate introduction to the topic of homelessness. Pair this volume with Eve Bunting's Fly Away Home (Clarion, 1991) for an introduction to an increasingly pervasive topic.

Gr. 4[^]-7. Photojournalist Hubbard runs the Shooting Back program to give homeless children a chance to document their own lives through photographs. Here he presents the stirring first-person narratives and photographs of four young people. Sarah Lewis, 10, and Christina Coito, 9, live at a mission church in Santa Monica, California. Lennie, 12, moves all the time with his family and has lived in their car, in parks, and in public buildings. Brian Heflin, 9, is no longer homeless, but his family can't afford electricity in their house. Hubbard doesn't make the common mistake of crowding too many stories into one book. The design is spacious and accessible, and the black-and-white photos of homeless people are powerful. However, the narrative voices all sound the same, and the photos are neither captioned nor attributed. Especially in a book that personalizes the "homeless" stereotype, we want to know who's who in the pictures, who took them, and where. Which one is Lennie? Who took the picture? It's the heartbreaking particulars that will grab kids, especially the dreams of shelter and privacy, the yearning to have a house someday "with a fence around it and a dog in the backyard." Hazel Rochman

LIVES TURNED UPSIDE DOWN: HOMELESS CHILDREN IN THEIR OWN WORDS AND PHOTOGRAPHS BY JIM HUBBARD PDF

Four children tell, through their own photos and heartfelt narration, what it's like to be homeless. Jim Hubbard, founder of Shooting Back, an education and media center that enables homeless children to learn photographic skills and document their world, chose children from various parts of the country with differing views of what it means to be homeless. The resulting photo essay provides an emotionally powerful, personal view of an issue that affects us all. 39 black-and-white photos.

disappointing and somewhat inappropriate

By Melissa

I bought this book to discuss poverty with elementary students. The actual book is of poor quality- the typesetting is off, the photos look like they came off of someone's photocopier.

The stories are fine, but I cannot use this book for my students- principally because a photo on p. 33 shows a child making a rude hand gesture.

This book would be appropriate for students in grades middle school and above.

Homeless Children

By Milly Westbrook

The book was short and to the point. It somewhat went into the lives of some of the children. It left me wanting to read far more than was given and I felt somewhat cheated but other than that the book was ok...

I thought since it was told through the perspectives of children that it would be a good fit for elementary students

By Tammi Lee

It was not what I expected. I thought since it was told through the perspectives of children that it would be a good fit for elementary students. It is not. The text is visually unappealing even for an adult.
